ABSTRACT
Analyzing the effect of political prejudice on media is the main corpus of this research. News articles in Arabic and English are analyzed showing how media tackles the execution of Saddam Hussein. This study discusses the neutrality of Arabic and English news agencies and their effect on directing readers' thinking. It is mainly based on a qualitative analysis. It is a descriptive analytical research. The data collected depends on news articles as discourse samples to be analyzed shedding light on the research question from another perspective. It finds that both writers use word choice and persuasive techniques to send hidden messages. So, their way of prejudice is reflected in their headline, lead paragraph and content of news. It is expected that doing further research concerning a contrastive analysis of Arabic and English texts will help in enriching the corpus of critical discourse analysis.