The thesis identifies the classes of the society during the ptolemaic era, which was as complicated, racial and universal as any occupied one. The ptolemaic occupiers adopted a policy of indulgence with all classes of the society, particularly the Egyptians, as an imperialistic strategy through which they sought legitimacy. The temples built all over Egypt, especially in Upper Egypt, stand as a proof of that policy which included an interest in ancient Egypt theology.