

Job competencies necessary for social workers to face the pressures of work in private schools

Abstract

Education is one of the basic criteria for judging the progress of societies. The progress of any society depends on the educated and trained forces that this society possesses, capable of adapting its natural resources and using them optimally to advance the wheel of progress and achieve the well-being of the individual and society. Private education provides educational and educational services and scientific and sports activities that government schools cannot provide, in addition to using new teaching methods. The work pressures that occur in the school environment are considered among the highest stressful environments in society compared to other work environments, and social service is one of the humanitarian professions that have an effective role. To help the school achieve its goals, The results of the study proved that school social statisticians face many pressures, whether due to the school administration, co-workers, or social orientation, which is reflected on their professional performance.
