The profession of social work arose in Western societies and other societies as a response to the special problems of each society, and with the successive developments and changes that affected societies in general and the Egyptian society in particular, social work and its multiple disciplines sought to bring about changes in line with the new developments in society. Many roles in different institutions, but as a result of the bureaucracy of the institutions and their commitment to routine and lack of capabilities, which weakened their role in society, which affected the effectiveness of the profession. It has become imperative for the social service to develop from itself and renew itself to catch up with everything new, as it must keep pace with progress and always strive to improve its role in society. The ideology of the profession and society remained to help it perform its role towards its members.

Therefore, this study seeks to try to determine the controls of the private professional practice of social work in the family field as an initial step from which the profession proceeds to other fields to achieve a prominent place for the profession among other professions in society.

The time has come for those interested in this profession to unite efforts to try to employ it in a manner that is compatible with the reality and nature of their society so that it can occupy the appropriate position for it, fulfill the expected role in those societies and make its practitioners feel their place and importance in those societies.
