Many young people around the world lack sufficient skills to compete in the formal labor market. This is due to the difficulty in obtaining job training opportunities and also due to the university curricula which are not relevant to the labor market. As a result of globalization and the attendant advances in technology and the significant increase in the demand for skilled labor, young people who do not possess skills or basic education are particularly vulnerable to unemployment and are practically unable to be employed.

Higher education, both governmental and private, is considered a top priority for human development worldwide. Within the framework of the growing goals of universities, higher education not only believes in the importance of the capabilities that graduates acquire for the labor market, but also believes in continuing education for all graduates in various specialized fields, as these graduates are the ones who possess comprehensive knowledge. It is that knowledge that includes technical knowledge and informational knowledge that includes analyzes and the ability to deduce for decision-making. These are the ones who develop the analytical skills that drive local economies and who support civil society and educate the community. They are the effective leaders of governments and help in making important decisions that have positive impacts on entire societies. Universities are sources of comprehensive knowledge production of a high level to achieve development.

The changes on the global scene, including globalization, have produced many opportunities. On the positive side, it seems that the role of higher education in building knowledge economies has increased significantly more than before. Certainly, higher education is a central point in creating intellectual capabilities that help produce knowledge and benefit from it, as well as push To post-education practices through continuing education, which have become necessary to update and develop comprehensive knowledge.

The researcher's thought turned to choosing the topic of his current study on the professional requirements necessary for students to acquire work skills in NGOs to compete in the labor market by applying to social workers working in NGOs and community development institutions in which social work students are trained at the Faculty of Social Work - Fayoum University, so that through This is to develop and update the field training in the college in line with the reality of professional practice in the field of NGOs. Accordingly, the researcher identified the most important professional skills to work in NGOs as one of the areas of the labor market for the social worker. These skills are: strategic planning skill, report writing skill, communication skill, coordination skill, skill time management .
